ABSTRACT

Elderly is a closing period in a person's life span which is marked by certain physical and psychological changes. Common problems that occur in the elderly where the physical condition is weak and helpless, so they have to depend on others. Disability is someone who has physical, intellectual, and mental limitations so that some elderly people with disabilities experience obstacles in their activities and have difficulty adapting. Physical disability is impaired movement function, including paralysis, stiffness, paraplegia, cerebral palsy (CP), due to amputation, stroke, leprosy, and others. This study aims to describe the meaning of life in elderly people with physical disabilities in Yogyakarta. This study uses qualitative methods, data collection is done by interviews, observation and documentation using purposive sampling techniques, namely researchers have certain considerations. The research subjects were three elderly people with physical disabilities and two significant others. Data collection in this study used interviews compiled from the theory of the meaning of life from Basteman (2007) based on five aspects, namely self-understanding, positive action, deepening of chess values, and worship. The research results of the three research subjects have similarities and differences in interpreting the meaning of life that can be found in life, both in happy and sad situations. The three subjects took the right attitude towards what they were experiencing by showing being able to adapt to the conditions they were experiencing, living with enthusiasm, taking positive actions, being grateful for the life they lived and having goals and having faith.
